A REPORT ON UNDERGROUND SOLDIERS.

By Hayley Harris Rm 4

One hundred years ago during WW1, soldiers dug out tunnels that led 30 metres underground into enormous caverns. The underground network that sheltered them was mostly built by miners from New Zealand. They were members of the NZ Tunnelling Company, a special unit of the NZ Army Force during the First World War. Thousands of men once rested in these stone caverns. The first World War began in 1914 when the German Army invaded Belgium and then swept into France. The Allies stopped the German advance and both sides dug a long line of trenches that faced one another. The space between the trenches was called "no-mans land". The Allies tried to take over the German trenches by sending thousands of soldiers across "no-mans land" by foot. Lots of men died after being shot or shelled. To limit the risk to their men, they both dug tunnels leading under "no-mans land". In and around the city of Arras in France, the ground was mostly soft sandstone. The soldiers dug through it easily using shovels and pick-axes. The soldiers hauled the bags of loose sandstone back through the tunnels and scattered it carefully and not around the entrance as that was a risk to the men inside. Tunnelling on the Western front was terrifying. Soldiers feared digging into the German tunnels.

The soldiers also used Geophones which were a very difficult piece of equipment to use. A lot of soldiers lives depended on them. If they used them right they could hear the faint tap of the German picks. This also caused a lot of stress.
